Instrumentation technique	Method	Merits	Demerits
Balanced forced technique	Placement phase (placement of file with a clockwise motion of maximum 180° with apical advancement) Cutting phase (counterclockwise rotation of 120° with apical pressure) Removal phase (clockwise rotation with coronal movement of file)	Better apical control of file Less amount of extrusion of debris from canal Good centering of instrument in the canal	High incidence of procedural errors such as instrument breakage and canal stripping Requires more working time
Step back technique	Apical preparation is done with smaller files and then the length of file is reduced with increase in file size	Comparatively better than the standardized technique	Increased incidence of perforation and iatrogenic errors in severely curved canals
Step down technique	The coronal portion of the canal is prepared before the apical portion and then the apical area is prepared with smaller files	Less periapical extrusion of debris Less apical zip formation Less chances of ledge formation Straight access to the apical region Better penetration of irrigant	Increased incidence of ledge formation
Standardized technique	The file or reamer is inserted to the full working length and the canal is cleaned	Easy to prepare straight canal	Ledge formation, zipping, and perforation in severely curved canal
Anticurvature technique	Selective filing in the coronal portion of curved canals to prevent strip perforations into the furcation; the walls on the opposite side from the curve are instrumented more than the inner walls, resulting in a decrease of the overall degree of canal curvature	Less incidence of perforation in curved canals	Requires expertise
